This free course will involve weekly 1.5 hour interactive lectures, discussions, background readings and an opportunity to interact with others who share your interest. The course is in English but key readings are available in Burmese and there will be Burmese interpretation available for the live lecturers.

The first six weeks will focus on international human rights standards on freedom of expression, media freedom and digital rights. The next three weeks will examine the legal environment for freedom of expression in Myanmar both before and since the 2021 coup

The course is hosted by the Centre for Law and Democracy, a Canadian international human rights organisation which advocates for foundational rights for democracy:
